

involved a married woman with small children who longed for a relaxing weekend away from the kids. Alibi concocted a story that the woman had won a free spa weekend in a prize drawing and hired an actor to call her home and leave a voicemail message informing her of her "win."

Still, Tracy admits that the company assumes many of its clients are using the service for the purpose of committing adultery. Not exactly uplifting news. But, hey, if Alibi's site is the worst thing you can find on the Internet, then you're not looking hard enough.
